	A few apps changed my workflow the way Simplenote did. Soon after John Gruber's public endorsement of Simplenote for iPhone, I decided to give the app a try, as I needed a fast and reliable solution to organize my notes. I remember those days. It was early days of MacStories, there was no team behind the website you see now, I didn't know back then I would need a cloud solution for my posts someday. Heck, I used to write posts in Pages.
	Eventually I realized I needed to be able to start a writing session at my Mac, and finish at my girlfriend's place if I had time. Or, I could just jot down a few ideas while on the go and turn them into posts later. As I realized that, I tried Simplenote.
	See, I try many new apps every week. Sometimes I think that it'd be interesting to keep on refining my worfklow (thus changing my app setup) and see what happens. You know my problem with financial apps, right? I can't stick with one. I used to have the same problem with Twitter clients, but after many reinstalls and downloads ("I'm gonna delete it from iTunes, so I won't be tempted to install it again." Sure.) I found my way with Twitterrific on the iPhone and Osfoora on the iPad. Like I said, sometimes I think that this is just an interesting experiment a blogger can keep on doing just for the sake of it. If the results are good, even better.
	I never switched from Simplenote to another note taking app. I never, never thought of deleting it and trying something else. Some applications are developed with the precise intent of letting them evolve over time. Despite the updates released in the past months, Simplenote was a complete app from the start.
	Some apps are made to stay. And last night, Simplenote for iPhone and iPad got a lot better.
	Actually, Simplenote for iPhone, iPad and Web got a lot better. Not only Simplenote is universal on Apple's devices, the service is backed up by a great-looking (cheers to John Hicks for the stunning redesign) web interface that works and looks just like the mobile counterparts. Not to mention the infinite series of widgets, scripts, services and 3rd party apps that work with Codality's note taking tool, but that's another story.
	In case you missed my previous mentions of Simplenote (or the early days of MacStories, for that matter), a quick summary: it's cloud-based note taking tool that allows you to, ehm, take notes and save them online. Period. Hence the name Simplenote. All of this is packed inside a minimal (yet beautiful) UI and a set of features that make the app one of the most used tools among casual users and pros. That was until two days ago, because now (version 3.0.2) Simplenote is quite
